make trouble for Hooty and Mrs. Hogiy, and it was right then that he thought of Farmer Brown's Boy. Blacky's eyes snapped. He remember ed how once upon a time Farmer Brown's Boy had delighted to rob nests. Blacky had seen him take the eggs from the nests of Blacky's own relatives, and from many other feathered people. What he dld with the eggs Blacky had no idea. Just now be didn't care. If Farmer Brown's Boy would just happen to find Hooto's nest he would be sure to take those eggs, and then he. Blacky, would feel better. He would feel that be was even with Hooty.

Right away he began to try to think of some way to bring Farmer Brown's Boy over to the lonesome corner of the Green Forest where Hooty's nest was. If he could once get him there he felt sure that Farmer Brown's Boy would see the nest and climb up to it. Then, of course, he would take the eggs.
